

What lies ahead in my life? This is a question that often echoes in my mind—filled with uncertainty, hope, and the desire to grow. I wonder how I can accomplish the tasks set before me and what necessary actions I must take to move forward. At times, I also question my own maturity: Am I becoming the person I want to be? Am I learning enough from my past to shape a better future? These questions guide me as I reflect on my journey, my struggles, and the lessons that continue to shape who I am.

My life has never been perfectly organized. Coming from a broken family, I grew up transferring from one house to another, trying to adapt to different environments and people. This constant interchange made me feel unstable at times, unsure where I truly belonged.

Along the way, I faced problems that left deep marks—bullying that made me question my worth, anxiety that drained my energy, and depression that pushed me to the darkest moments of my life. I even reached the point where I confronted the idea of suicide. These experiences felt overwhelming, as if the world was too heavy for me to carry.

But despite everything, I managed to overcome them. Each hardship became part of my strength. I learned how to endure, how to stand up again, and how to keep going even when pain felt permanent. My journey taught me resilience and helped me realize that growth is possible even from the most difficult situations.

This is my reflection: life will always test us, but it also gives us the chance to find our own way to feel at home and free. For me, that feeling comes from playing video games, exploring my interests, and discovering my potential. These simple joys remind me that healing is possible and that I can always create spaces where I feel safe and understood.

In the end, what matters most is the willingness to seek improvement. Life moves forward, and so must we. As long as I keep growing, keep learning, and keep finding the strength to continue, I believe I can survive every challenge and move ahead toward a future I can shape for myself.
